Greenland may be regarded as one of the few countries which still present problems of primary importance to the explorer. Known to Europeans since the days of Erik the Red, the wandering Viking who is credited with discovering and colonizing the region in the latter part of the 10th century, the northern and northeastern outlines of this great continental area are still represented on our maps by lines of conjectural rather than ascertained exactness. Yet, in view of the physical disadvantages attending research in the region, the achievements of the past cannot be lightly estimated and the eventual survey of the unknown area may justly be regarded as a geographical work requiring the highest qualities on the...
