Excerpt: .in our lives than the days that are gone, or even than those which are still with us. The past influences us as openly as the present. We yield graciously or ungraciously according to temperament, disposition, or whim. The upholders of tradition take the past into partnership, just as modernists in art and life declare war upon olden times. But the influence of the future is insidious and sly, making no fuss, demonstrating little, but pulling, pulling all things, always, in the interests of posterity. Nothing we do and nothing that others do to us are unaffected by this prevailing and powerful intrigue. Even any tendency to live unreservedly and wholly in the present, which is the aim of not a few, is curbed and guided by Nature's regard for posterity. Life is always cast receive it (with interest) after many fdays. I what life is doing in bulk we are repeating in detail, for are not we a part of lif-- rolled round in earth's diurnal course, with rocks and stones and trees P Whether we hate or love posterity, work for or against the future, is all one. Posterity will take toll of our little doings in this or any other present time. In this particular present time of grace, or the lack of it, posterity is having her will of us, and even winning advocates and proselytes of sorts. Some ninety years ago it was safe for Daniel Webster to...
