Excerpt: .of some few preachers of acknowledged attainments in pulpit oratory, both in the Protestant and Roman Catholic connections. The general character of the French school of preaching resembles that of the German, and is quite unlike that of the English. The English preachers disdain the arts of oratory, the French revel in animated diction, and graceful gesture. The former are solid, the latter ornamental. The former delve in theological lore, and feed the understanding; the latter elaborate eloquent paragraphs, to rouse up the sensibilities, and kindle into a blaze the feelings. The former have more of light, the latter more of heat. Both have their faults. If the former are instructive, they are also too dull and heavy. If the latter are animating and soul-stirring, they are sometimes too showy and bombastic. If the former are wise in having an eye to the intellect, and the substance, they are unwise in losing sight of the heart and the manner. If the latter delight the imagination, and play skillfully upon the strings of the passions, it were wisdom, also, to unfold great principles, and lay a broad and deep foundation for a substantial and vigorous Christian life. Hence both the English and the French schools of pulpit eloquence should be studied. Some of the dryness of even the American pulpit could well be dispensed with, for more of the onction of the French. It is equally unwise either to copy, or to ignore, the one or...
