As we see in an example of an Israeli school, there are very hard methods of punishment. But on the other hand you can find such a useful method as early intervention as is shown with an example of how to prevent pupils from marijuana use. But the quality of the school lessons and behaviour of teachers plays another important role. Stress in classrooms can be minimized through smaller classes, higher qualification of the teachers and use of better and more interesting learning material like school books. If we take a closer look at a developmental theory, for example the theory of the Russian psychologist Galperin, we see that punishment is wrong because it interrupts the process of harmonious learning. Especially when you take a closer look at how children learn to read, you can understand why punishment for...
